LOW VISION GROUP?

The Two Rivers Senior Center is looking to gauge interest in a guided low vision support & discussion group. If you or someone you know is interested in this group, call Megan @ 920-793-5596

Did you know?

That approximately one out of every three bites of food you eat depends on the work of a pollinating insect, bird or animal?

Using pesticides to control unwanted plants, insect pests, rodents or plant diseases: like herbicides, insecticides, rodenticides and fungicides in your yard can harm or kill pollinators. Pollinators are bees, butterflies, hummingbirds and other animals that feed from flowers, transferring pollen in the process. Pollination also produces seeds and fruits that feed birds and other wildlife. Many blooming plants depend on pollinators for survival, and globally many pollinators are showing disturbing signs of decline from a variety of causes. When you use pesticides you could unintentionally harm pollinators and other beneficial insects. Of the pesticides, we believe insecticides cause the greatest challenge to pollinators. Using proper application practices when applying any pesticide is very important in keeping pollinators (and people) safe.
